Emma and her father were hiking up a mountain trail. The trail they had chosen was long and led to the top of the mountain. They had packed lunch and a few other things in their backpacks.

As they started up the trail, Emma's father pointed out the many different flowers and trees. He showed Emma the difference between the leaves of an oak tree and those of a sycamore tree.

"Look over there", Emma whispered softly.

They had just turned a corner of the trail. A tiny baby rabbit stood to the side of the path. It appeared to be lost as it stumbled around frantically in the tall grass.

"Its mother must be close by. Do you think we should stop and watch it?" she asked.

Concerned, Emma's father agreed. They had their lunch while waiting for the rabbit's mother. They also watched the tiny rabbit until it wore itself out and fell asleep. Not long after, they caught sight of a larger rabbit rushing through the bushes. It headed straight to the smaller one and sat down next to it.

Emma and her father packed their bags and continued up the mountain. They knew the tiny rabbit was safe.
