Comprehension Passage

The grandmaster of chess, Magnus Carlsen, entered the room. Without any introduction, he started talking about playing chess.

Remembering to be courteous, he stopped his talk on playing chess abruptly and said, "It's is great to be here. I will be starting my demonstration soon; please pay attention to the chess demonstration board. To improve your game, you may want to observe carefully. I am sure you will learn a few tricks in this demonstration."

The Norwegian grandmaster was in New York for a week to run a chess camp.

Carlsen spent the next hour replaying one of his games from memory. He asked the audience at certain points of his demonstration to figure out what the next move might have been. The audience racked their brains trying to figure out Carlsen's next move, while he sipped on his cup of coffee.

What was amazing was that Carlsen was able to remember every single chess move he had ever made. It was an astonishing feat, considering he had played more than 10,000 matches. He was also able to demonstrate to the audience alternative moves that a player might have taken to win the match.

When asked if he was shocked by a bold move by his opponent, David grinned and said, "Well, I would have seen it when I made my move."

When someone suggested a move that might lead to a draw, Carlsen chided him, " We are playing to win, not survive!"

For the following questions, choose your chosen answer.

What did the top-rated chess player do when he first entered the room? [1m]

- A) He introduced himself.
- B) He talked to the audience about playing chess.
- C) He sipped his coffee.
