Question 62

Last December, my wife, Jane, and I purchased a new car. We decided to drive from California to Houston to spend a week with her grandmother. We had a wonderful time and stayed to the last possible minute. On the return trip, we needed to get home in a hurry. The pipes in our house had been leaking for a while and we had fixed an appointment with the plumber to take a look. Jane had also agreed to look after her friend's daughter as her friend needed to run some important errands. We drove straight through - one person driving while the other one slept. After driving in the heavy rain for several hours, we arrived home late at night. We were tired and ready for a hot shower and a soft bed. I felt that no matter how tired we were, we should unpack the car that night but all Jane wanted was the hot shower and the soft bed. Thus, we decided to wait and unload the car in the morning.

At seven in the morning, we got up refreshed and ready to unpack the car. When we opened the front door, there was no car in the driveway! Jane and I looked at each other, looked back at the driveway, looked at each other again. "Well, where did you park the car?" Jane asked.

Laughing, I answered, "Right in the driveway." Stunned, I called the police and filed a report. I also activated our high-tech tracking system and called the tracking system company. They assured me that they had a 98 percent recovery rate within two hours. In two hours, I called them up. "We haven't found it yet, Mr Harris, but we have 94 percent recovery rate within four hours." Two more hours passed. I called again. Again they answered that they had not found my car and we had a 90 percent recovery rate of finding it within eight hours. Feeling annoyed, I told them to call me when they had found my car.

Later that day, I was watching an automobile commercial on television, "Wouldn't you like to have this car in your driveway?" I responded jokingly, "Sure I would! I had exactly the same one yesterday."

As the day unfolded, Jane became increasingly upset as she remembered more and more of what had been in the car - our irreplaceable family photographs from past generations and all our camera equipment. These were items of little importance to our survival, yet they seemed of major importance at that moment.

Anxious and frustrated, Jane asked me, "How can you joke about this when all of these things and our brand new car are missing?" I looked at her and said with a smile, "Honey, we can have a stolen car and be all upset or we can have a stolen car and be happy. Either way, we have a stolen car. I truly believe our attitudes and moods are our choice and right now I choose to be happy." I then went online to search for the bus routes from our home to my office.

Five days later, our car was found by the tracking system company. However, it was returned to us without our belongings. In fact, there was a bad dent on the left side of the car. I took it to the mechanic for repair and was happy to hear they would have it back to us within a week. At the end of that week, I dropped off the rental car. I was excited and relieved to have our own car back. However, these feelings were short-lived. On the way home, I crashed into the rear of another car just as I exited the expressway. It did not damage the car I ran into but ours was not as lucky. Fortunately, I managed to drive the car home. When I got out of the car to check the damage, I discovered that one of the headlights was shattered.

As I was standing in the driveway looking at the car, scolding myself for hitting the other car, Jane arrived home. She walked up to me, looked at the car and said, "Honey, we can have a wrecked car and be all upset, or we can have a wrecked car and be happy. Either way, we have a wrecked car, so let's choose to be happy."

I surrendered with a hearty laugh and we went on to have a wonderful dinner and evening together.
