How ABX Cycling Club began

Two years ago, Alex and Ben, the founders of ABX Cycling Club (Alex Ben Xplores) were cycling at East Coast Park. It was then that Alex suggested raising funds for charity as he had always wanted to help those in need. Alex shared with Ben about a movie in which a man had cycled around the world to raise money for his daughter's operation.

Inspired by the movie, Alex suggested the idea of raising funds for charity on bicycles. Both Alex and Ben made preparations for the fund-raising and word got around. Eventually they were joined by five other cyclists. The seven cyclists set off on what was then known as ABX Aid and it raised $5 000.

Now, ABX Cycling Club is managed and run entirely by volunteers who are either keen cyclists or individuals from different walks of life sharing a passion to help those in need. Through cycling, its members are united to help alleviate the sufferings of the less privileged.

Two years ago, Alex and Ben, the founders of ABX Cycling Club (Alex Ben Xplores) were cycling at East Coast Park. It was then that Alex suggested raising funds for charity as he had always wanted to help those in need. Alex shared with Ben about a movie in which a man had cycled around the world to raise money for his daughter's operation.

Inspired by the movie, Alex suggested the idea of raising funds for charity on bicycles. Both Alex and Ben made preparations for the fund-raising and word got around. Eventually they were joined by five other cyclists. The seven cyclists set off on what was then known as ABX Aid and it raised $5 000.

Now, ABX Cycling Club is managed and run entirely by volunteers who are either keen cyclists or individuals from different walks of life sharing a passion to help those in need. Through cycling, its members are united to help alleviate the sufferings of the less privileged.

Question 62

Primary 6 English » Primary 6 English (Term 2)

2 pts

Matt and Brian owned rental cabins on Shields Mountains in Tennessee, USA. Rental cabins are a popular type of guesthouse among tourists who have decided to camp on the mountains for a night or two. One night, the men were forced to play an unlikely role, rescuing tourists from the flames of a raging fire on the mountain. That night, Matt got a frantic call from his mother. "The mountain is on fire and Brian's up there!" she screamed. Brian was apparently up there trying to put the fire out by himself. 5

Matt drove by the main road to reach the cabins, only to see police officers blocking all the traffic at a junction. He turned around and headed for an alternative route. He was halfway up the winding path before his car gave up. He managed to borrow a van from a passer-by. He drove up the mountain to join Brian, so they could fight the battle together. 10

Both of them headed first to Brian's cluster of rental cabins. Brian wanted to make sure all his guests had left the cabins and he was glad that they had.

Then, Brian had to make a choice. It was either to save his cabins or rescue the people renting other cabins nearby. These people were tourists who did not know their way around the area. 15

The two friends travelled across the smoky mountain, knocking on the cabin doors to alert tourists about the emergency and then led them to safety. Brian hopped into a tourist's car and drove the family down the mountain on roads enveloped in smoke and virtually impassable. "I know every nook and cranny of this mountain. Luckily, it came in handy," Brian said. 20

Matt followed him in his van, and when one family was a safe distance from the fire, Brian and Matt would take the van back up the mountain to look for another trapped person. They helped an elderly woman flee across hot gravel to reach her car, and they found a man nearly unconscious in a burning cabin. Thanks to their unplanned ferry service, both of them evacuated fourteen people. 25

"I owe that guy my life," said Steve, who had lived on the mountain for many years. Steve's home was burnt to a cusp, but he survived after Brian had picked him up and driven him to the foot of the mountain.

On the way down the mountain with the last survivor, Brian and Matt got separated in the heavy smoke and flames. Matt drove the survivor's car and went to look for Brian. 30

By then, the flames had licked the gravel road. Matt was forced to press a wet towel against his nose and mouth to prevent himself from suffocating.

He found Brian near the cabin they had just evacuated, gasping for breath. Matt helped him into his van and gave him a bottle of water to drink. Soon after, Brian regained his composure and managed to drive his van. He followed Matt closely behind. With 35 flames blocking him on either side, Matt stepped on his car accelerator and slammed right through a tree lying across the road. Brian did the same and minutes later, they were off the mountain.

The fire did not claim a single life on Shields Mountain. However, Brian's home was destroyed and he lost some of the cabins he owned to the fire. With so much to rebuild, 40 he only had one gleam of hope to bring closure. "I wasn't worried about the property damage, especially when I saw those families trapped on the mountain," he said. "I just want to know that their lives are going to go on. It makes it all worthwhile," he said.

Question 68

Matt and Brian owned rental cabins on Shields Mountains in Tennessee, USA. Rental cabins are a popular type of guesthouse among tourists who have decided to camp on the mountains for a night or two. One night, the men were forced to play an unlikely role, rescuing tourists from the flames of a raging fire on the mountain. That night, Matt got a frantic call from his mother. "The mountain is on fire and Brian's up there!" she screamed. Brian was apparently up there trying to put the fire out by himself.

Matt drove by the main road to reach the cabins, only to see police officers blocking all the traffic at a junction. He turned around and headed for an alternative route. He was halfway up the winding path before his car gave up. He managed to borrow a van from a passer-by. He drove up the mountain to join Brian, so they could fight the battle together. Both of them headed first to Brian's cluster of rental cabins. Brian wanted to make sure all his guests had left the cabins and he was glad that they had.

Then, Brian had to make a choice. It was either to save his cabins or rescue the people renting other cabins nearby. These people were tourists who did not know their way around the area.

The two friends travelled across the smoky mountain, knocking on the cabin doors to alert tourists about the emergency and then led them to safety. Brian hopped into a tourist's car and drove the family down the mountain on roads enveloped in smoke and virtually impassable. "I know every nook and cranny of this mountain. Luckily, it came in handy," Brian said.

Matt followed him in his van, and when one family was a safe distance from the fire, Brian and Matt would take the van back up the mountain to look for another trapped person. They helped an elderly woman flee across hot gravel to reach her car, and they found a man nearly unconscious in a burning cabin. Thanks to their unplanned ferry service, both of them evacuated fourteen people.

"I owe that guy my life," said Steve, who had lived on the mountain for many years. Steve's home was burnt to a cusp, but he survived after Brian had picked him up and driven him to the foot of the mountain.

On the way down the mountain with the last survivor, Brian and Matt got separated in the heavy smoke and flames. Matt drove the survivor's car and went to look for Brian. By then, the flames had licked the gravel road. Matt was forced to press a wet towel against his nose and mouth to prevent himself from suffocating.

He found Brian near the cabin they had just evacuated, gasping for breath. Matt helped him into his van and gave him a bottle of water to drink. Soon after, Brian regained his composure and managed to drive his van. He followed Matt closely behind. With flames blocking him on either side, Matt stepped on his car accelerator and slammed right through a tree lying across the road. Brian did the same and minutes later, they were off the mountain.

The fire did not claim a single life on Shields Mountain. However, Brian's home was destroyed and he lost some of the cabins he owned to the fire. With so much to rebuild, he only had one gleam of hope to bring closure. "I wasn't worried about the property damage, especially when I saw those families trapped on the mountain," he said. "I just want to know that their lives are going to go on. It makes it all worthwhile," he said.
