After days of heavy rain, the blazing African sun burst out above Kaityo village. Amal had been proudly helping his father, Tahir, with the family's vegetable farm across the river. The river was flowing fast as they neared it on their way home.

Amal had a sudden moment of unease before they crossed the river. That morning, his grandmother had begged them not to work in the field. She had dreamt that her son and grandson were walking along a riverbank with a crocodile walking beside them. Tahir gently assured her, as he always did, that the river where they crossed was too shallow for crocodiles. Bearing his father's words in mind, Amal stepped into the water.

Then he saw it in the muddy water barely two metres ahead. A long, scaly grey shape had silently emerged between Amal and his father, blocking his path. As his father waded on obliviously, it lunged at the boy with its wide-open jaws.

Terror gripped Amal's heart. There was no time to be afraid; every second made a difference. The boy swam frantically to the bank. He could not hear the predator gliding behind him, but every fibre of his being could sense it. In a few desperate strokes, Amal reached the bank. Heart pounding, he tried to haul himself onto land. Unfortunately, his foot slipped and he fell back into the water.

Splash! Hearing that, Tahir turned around. To his horror, a two-metre long crocodile was approaching his son. Instinctively, he dived into the water and paddled furiously towards Amal. Goosebumps formed on Amal's skin as the beast inched closer to him. He willed his limbs to move but he froze to the spot. "This is it," he thought.

"Hold on to the reeds, Amal!" Tahir boomed, worried that Amal might be swept away by the strong currents. Snapping out of his trance, Amal grabbed the stems like lifelines. Sensing the presence of a stronger opponent, the crocodile retreated and disappeared beneath the water. With renewed hope, Tahir surfaced beside his son. He lifted the trembling Amal up. Elevated, Amal scrambled onto the bank gratefully.

Tahir struggled for a foothold in the sludgy water as he gripped the reeds. Before he could get out of the water, a strong current swept him off his feet. Anticipating that that would happen, the crocodile lay in ambush instead of attacking its prey head on. Within seconds, Tahir came face to face with the predator again. Dropping its jaw, the crocodile approached him more gingerly this time.

Wasting no time, Tahir seized the first move: He hurled himself at the crocodile; heaved himself onto its knobby back and crossed his feet under its soft yellow belly. Sitting astride it, he used his right hand to grab a bunch of reeds and pulled the beast nearer to the bank. With his left hand, he snapped off a reed and thrust it into the back of the beast's pale throat.

In pain from Tahir's sudden move, the crocodile then flung him into the water before gliding away. Tahir managed to stumble back up to the bank.

"Are you all right, Dad?" Amal shouted as his father collapsed on a rock. Tahir said weakly with a smile, "We should have listened to Grandma."

"We nearly lost our lives, but we are safe now!" Amal heaved a sigh of relief.

What did Tahir do for a living?
